In-text citations in MLA
After you directly quote or paraphrase a source, you must include an in-text citation in parentheses.

The in-text citation allows your reader to find the longer citation on your Works Cited list easily.
The in-text citation requires the author’s last name (or the article title, if there is no author)

the page number of the quoted or paraphrased passage (if the source has page numbers)
After your quote, type parentheses.

The period ending the sentence goes after the parentheses.
bun sometimes – reading all day couldn’t be further from the truth. A recent Publisher’s Weekly article noted, “Librarianship is a notoriously opaque profession, and most Americans have about as much understanding of what we do as they have of cloistered nuns, or actuaries” (Kenney 18).
pre-school through high school. Public libraries can be found in almost every town, and serve “communities of all sizes and types,” while special libraries serve niche organizations, like “corporations, hospitals, the military, museums, private businesses, and the government” (“Types of Libraries”). Despite the wide variety in types of librarians and librarians however, the

The information in the in-text citation is the first part of your longer citation. This allows your reader to find the citation easily on your Works Cited page.
